DOCTOR OF PHILOSOPHY (EDUCATION)

MATSHIKIZA Siphokazi

PROFILE

This study sought to examine high school teachers' implementation of Multicultural Education (ME) in multicultural classrooms. Using face-to-face semi-structured interviews, focus groups, document reviews and observation, data were collected from two high schools in the Chris Hani West District of Education, with participating teachers and learners having been purposively selected.

The study revealed that although several teachers were implementing ME, they experienced a number of challenges, including lack of training from the Department of Education. Furthermore, as there are no official recommended texts for ME, teachers consult an array of textbooks which address diverse content and limited support was received from the District Education office in terms of ME materials. The study recommends the establishment of an effective training programme for teachers for implementation of ME in classrooms. It also proposes that the Department of Education make available recommended texts and supplementary materials on education of a multicultural nature.

PROFILE

This thesis examined the learning styles, availability and utilization of instructional materials as correlates of Grade 6 learners' Mathematics performance in Buffalo City. The findings of the study revealed that Grade 6 learners' learning styles (visual, auditory, kinesthetic) have a significant effect on their performance in Mathematics. Learning style emerged as the best predictor of learners' mathematical performance, while the availability and use of instructional materials emerged as relatively strong predictors. The study further found that Grade 6 learners with visual learning styles performed best in Mathematics, followed by those who employ auditory and kinesthetic learning styles. The study recommends that teachers be trained in different types of learning styles that learners exhibit, as learning styles not only influence how learners learn and teachers teach, but also how these aspects intersect during classroom activities.

PROFILE

The study examined assessment procedures used during Industrial Attachment (IA), for the Industrial Clothing Design and Construction (ICDC) academic programme at selected polytechnic colleges in Zimbabwe. Data were collected from two polytechnic colleges and three host industries that were sampled purposively. Individual interviews with lecturers and focus group discussions with ICDC students were the major data-collection instruments, and these were supported by document reviews. The units of analysis included policymakers, external assessors and supervisors. Amongst others, the study reported on three overarching discoveries, namely that (i) non-comprehensive and non-aligned IA and Industrial Attachment Assessment (IAA) policies have resulted in inconsistent and unsystematic administration of IAA procedures; (ii) lack of effective collaboration between colleges and their host industries have impacted negatively on students' assessment; and (iii) given the lack of effective practical competencies for assessment, students considered IAA to be ineffective. A recommendation is made that a more meaningful partnership be established between colleges and their host industries.
